South African Government Publications: an introduction

A small selection of South African government publications is held in respective campus libraries within UKZN. Please check the iLink catalogue. Many online resources are available via the SA Government website (www.gov.za/) and the subscription databases Sabinet online all legal products, Juta e publications and LexisNexis (<http://library.ukzn.ac.za> – Electronic resources – Databases A-Z). A selective list of UKZN holdings is provided in this guide.

Origin and function

Government publications are those official publications emanating from any government body or contractee commissioned by government. In South Africa there are publications from central government which includes parliament and all ministries and departments. There are also provincial and local government publications, thus collectively producing a huge amount of documentation. The purpose of all these publications is to place on record the workings of government and to assist government with policy making for distribution of resources; good governance and planning.

They reflect the three functions of government namely :

- legislative: to make laws (Parliament);
- executive: carry out the laws (Cabinet assisted by the civil service);
- judicial: ensure citizens abide by the law (Courts). Many court reports are published by commercial companies.

A government is usually by far the largest publisher of information within a country. This is because there are so many facets to government. A government needs a large amount of information to undertake its duties of governance and, a government is often the only body with sufficient resources at its disposal to undertake particular work. For example, the population census requires a large amount of resources, particularly personnel, to undertake the census and collate the responses and of course this all costs vast sums of money which most organizations could not afford.

To provide an example of the varied nature of government publications, from parliamentary activity alone are published rules of conduct, agendas and minutes of meetings/sessions, debates from sittings of parliament, legislation in draft (bill) and final form (act), memoranda to departments, lists of members of the houses of parliament, the official government gazette, reports of committees and commissions of inquiry and so on. Many of these publications are mirrored at provincial level, all nine of them!!

Why are government publications important?

- They provide a record of official activity and rationale for such activity
- They reflect policy making and changes in governance
- They provide information that might not be possible unless undertaken by government eg population census

- They provide valuable statistical information on a wide range of activities eg trade, welfare, education
- The government is also a major producer of maps, both geological and topographical
- They tend to collect information on an ongoing basis in order to inform their activities so information is fairly up to date and continuous
- They are important sources of primary information.

Government publications have become particularly important and more visible since the 1994 election because the whole system of government and participation in government has changed with the new dispensation and the new Constitution includes a Bill of Rights for the first time. All existing and new legislation and activity must be in harmony with the principles of the Constitution. The Constitutional Court may decide on the constitutionality of matters and the interpretation of the Constitution. Since 1994 a whole series of White papers (policy documents) have been published which have examined the current situations in all spheres of life such as education, land, population, sport, tourism and the like, and, after public consultation, provided a new way forward in the form of policy proposals. The first of these was the RDP or reconstruction and development white paper. Annual reports of government departments indicate how departments are carrying out government policy and often have useful statistical information (RPs).

Problems associated with government publications

- Quantity
- Often poorly indexed
- Poor distribution channels and marketing
- Frequent name changes of government departments and bodies
- Numbering sequences change and are hard to follow
- Changing formats
- Not all government information is accessible

Examples of key central government publications

1. Legislation – bills and statutes

- Legislation comprises laws that have been written down. A law is also known as an act or a statute. The highest law making body is the national parliament. The Constitution is the supreme law and contains a Bill of Rights. While in draft form and before approval by Parliament, an Act is known as a Bill.
- Every act has a name and number, re-commencing at one (1) each year. An act is cited thus: Second-hand Goods Act 6 of 2009. The purpose of legislation is to provide guidance about, boundaries to and acceptability as regards behaviours in almost every facet of life. Legislation may also provide penalties for non adherence to rules. Many post 1994 laws of South Africa include a preamble which serves to indicate the rationale for or constitutional context of a law.
- The authoritative version of any act is initially published in the Government Gazette. The commercial publishers Juta and LexisNexis have print (looseleaf so updated 4 times per year) and electronic full text versions of legislation. Post 1994 legislation is also available from the SA government's website.
- An act cannot provide all the necessary detail so the relevant Minister may when necessary publish regulations (delegated legislation). An example is professions that are governed by acts of parliament such as engineers, psychologists, lawyers and so on. The relevant acts stipulate fee structures that practitioners may charge. As fees have to change over time due to inflation etc, an act cannot prescribe in advance what fees might have to be charged. At intervals, new fees will be negotiated in the profession and then published as regulations. These regulations are published in the Government gazette.

2. Debates of Parliament (Hansard)

Readings of proposed legislation, questions and answers and other matters discussed in Parliament are reported verbatim in 'Hansard'. These are in print form only. The name 'Hansard' derives from the Englishman who first started recording parliamentary debates in the UK. The debates have their own indexes.

3. Government Gazettes incl. Regulation Gazettes

- The Gazette is the official source by which the government communicates with its citizens concerning its activities, specifically those of government departments such as legislation, general and legal notices, for example, permit applications for liquor licenses and name changes; tenders to name but a few
- Each Gazette is identified by its unique number within a volume and the date of issue.
- The official version of a statute is that which appears in the Gazette. Each statute is published in a separate gazette
- Regulation Gazettes, which form part of the gazette sequence, also have their own numbers in addition to the Gazette number. They reflect the detail for implementing a statute for example a statute regarding a professional body will stipulate a fee structure. Such actual fees will be published in a regulation gazette and as fees are amended new regulations will be published
- The Library receives printed copies of the Government Gazette and it is available electronically via Sabinet online all legal products since 1910. Selected regulations are now starting to appear online in databases such as Juta e Publications.

4. White papers

These include reports on proposed water schemes; explanatory memoranda on bills and topical reports. Since 1994 white papers have reflected policy proposals starting with the RDP. They are often preceded by a draft white paper or a green paper. Since 1994, white papers that are policy papers that have been received by the Library, have been treated like books and are reflected in the Library's catalogue. They are available electronically since 1994 from the Government's website.

5. RPs - annual reports of departments and commissions of inquiry reports. Most departments now have their own websites and most publish their specialist reports full text. Between 1910 and 1961 RPs were known as UGs. These are only available in print.

6. Specialist departmental activities and associated reports

- a) Statistics SA - produce the census; specialized statistical reports and a bulletin. In print and electronic. The Library has a few print publications. The Public library in Pietermaritzburg holds copies of all official publications.
- b) Patents, trademarks etc
- c) Surveyor general – maps
- d) National Treasury: budget and fiscal reviews
- e) Government Communication and Information System – SA Yearbook; tenders and so on
